Giving help abroad

Eddie Bergman, 28, graduated from Northport High School and founded Miracle Corners of the World, a nonprofit group that does development projects in Africa. The group also brings suburban whites and urban minorities together for annual retreats in Manhattan to develop plans for entrepreneurial solutions to community problems. Bergman is a graduate of New York University and teaches at the New York City College of Technology and is executive director of the Africa Travel Association.

"At Northport High School, two teachers, Peter White and Anthony Asplin, inspired me to do two different things — to go to Nicaragua in 11th grade to do volunteer work, then to start a DJ company. I realized that anything is possible, that the world is larger than Northport itself and there are opportunities to get involved. . . . In 12th grade, I made a presentation to a United Nations committee and received a grant to build cafeterias in schools in Nicaragua. I learned I could combine my interests in business and social projects.

"At NYU, I thought about how many problems there are in the world, and I wondered if I could do more. I cofounded Miracle Corners of the World to bring young people together, to do good works with an entrepreneurial focus. I wanted to go to Africa, and I sent out 40 letters to different contacts there, offering to help small businesses. I got one response, from a nun in Tanzania. I went over there and helped open a garage where mechanics could train and work.

"I go out and inspire others to join our vision to get active, to create local change through global exchange. We've raised more than $2 million in cash and in-kind contributions. We've constructed three community centers in Sierra Leone, and have built a health clinic in Tanzania, and gotten more than 40 American dentists and doctors to volunteer.

"We're active in the United States, too. We have a youth leadership training program with over 400 alumni, including Israelis and Palestinians who came to work together.

"My grandparents escaped Nazi Germany, and my parents left apartheid South Africa. I feel a calling, an urgency to harness energy from young people from different backgrounds. Martin Luther King was a visionary, and I've met Archbishop Desmond Tutu.

"I could fear being young, being the wrong color, having the wrong religion, or focusing internationally when there are so many problems locally. At the end of the day, you can let fear eat you up or you can do your best to make a difference."
